Human Trafficking

There are more people trapped in human trafficking today than at any other point in history. What can be done?

The Upstream Problem

Human trafficking is one of the greatest evils of our age—the buying and selling of God's children for profit. An estimated 27.6 million people are exploited today through forced labor, servitude, and commercial sexual exploitation. This is not a distant or isolated crime; it operates in our cities, our neighborhoods, and our digital spaces.

For too long, trafficking has been treated primarily as a series of isolated crimes rather than what it truly is: a highly organized, coordinated, and profitable business. Trafficking networks scale because the economics work—profits are high, risk is low, and enforcement is fragmented. Rescue alone, while essential, does not dismantle the systems that perpetuate exploitation.

Today, a convergence of data, technology, legal tools, and entrepreneurial innovation has made it possible to disrupt trafficking at the system level. The challenge is no longer whether trafficking can be confronted—but whether capital and coordination will be aligned to bankrupt the business of exploitation.
